The artists

both artists bring a unique frame of reference to the work. michael roseberry comes from the plains of west texas and started his academic career first as a student of botany, and then as a student of french language and culture, always maintaining a focus on ceramics. bruce winn's path to ceramics was quite direct—after seeing a pottery demonstration at the age of six, he knew that he wanted to be a potter, and never wavered from that goal. after undergraduate work at boston university, he completed his mfa at cranbrook academy and has carved a path as a professional artist and teacher.

The process

working closely together, these two artists have developed a body of work in high-fire porcelain. from the ground up, they formulated a fine durable clay body that serves as the base for the rich palette of glazes that they developed. the artists carve original low-relief patterns into wet clay from which they then make plaster molds. the surface of each object is completely covered by an embossed pattern to ensure that the surface is an integral element of the piece. the applied glaze runs and pools, accentuating the pattern on the clay beneath. the ceramics are designed for everyday use and enjoyment, all glazes are non-toxic and safe for the dishwasher and microwave.

The vision

michael roseberry and bruce winn meld function and beauty in a stylish process that is straightforward and uncomplicated, but not mundane. they strive to produce objects that appeal to those who see and celebrate beauty in everyday life. each piece engages the beholder with rich color and evocative pattern. purpose is fundamentally important: teapots should pour; cups should be comfortable to drink from and to hold; use and beauty should be in equal partnership.
